VERMONT'S MONSTER FROG

Unearthed 114 Feet Underground by Workmen in a Mine Shaft

In the summer of 1865 workmen while digging in a new shaft at an zinc mine at Forestdale, Vt., unearthed a huge bullfrog at a vertical depth of 114 feet under ground. The frog lay dormant in a sort of pocket in the hole, and while from the fact of being found at so great a depth is large size and its excellent state of preservation attracted attention.

The frog measured from tip of nose to end of spine about fourteen inches and was of light green color, in every respect resembling our common bullfrogs found on the grass at the surface of frog. For several hours the frog lay on the ground, then it began to jump up and backward in a convulsive manner. When several townsmen had come to see the big frog it was put into a pond near by and there for many years during summer nights it followed so faithfully that its voice could be heard for miles around.

One of the witnesses of its discovery was Frank Rogers of Brandon, Vt., now a retired merchant of that place and for a long time a resident of Forestdale, who was standing at the opening of the mine shaft when the frog was brought to the surface. Mr. Rogers was about 15 years old then.

If there be any ground for belief that the great frog belonged to another geological period than that in which we live can easily find reason to believe that reptiles live to advanced age. There were comparatively rapid changes in the earth's surface during the ice age period and it may be that this frog was entrapped during his hibernating time while already buried deep in the mud of some pond that was itself overwhelmed by a glacial deposit. Or possibly held trough during long ages, it was preserved and protected until our age and lay dormant in narrow confinement until released. All reptiles are cold-blooded and sluggish and possibly many a strange case have happened before, although they may not have been brought to man's attention.

This generally accepted theory is that, beginning with the Cenozoic era, we lost the origins and development of reptiles, and that for ages after these reptiles were man's transitory. The frog probably never attained the vast proportions found in the dinosaur, the giant lizard, a cousin of the frog, but no doubt frogs were much larger than they are now. The recent Quarternary epoch buried alive, no doubt, the mastodon, an animal much like our elephant, a dweller in our tropics. Shall our scientists say that the frog unearthed in Forestdale did not have the advantage in a race for survival?
